some state of the same gentleman went to see a poor old woman whom he knew. She was lame. She lived in one small room, and earned part of her living by knitting; for the rest she had to depend on the kindness of her friends. He asked her the same question that he had asked Mr. Astor: "Lydia are you happy?"

It won't buy off death. No, sir, my money does not make me happy."

Some penny-a-line whipper-snapper, in one of our exchanges, attacks the large grassles, which have been adopted by the fair ones, this season. If he objects to their size, he objects to the most sensible thing of which American women have ever been guilty, since we were a kitten or a school-girl. If he thinks them ungraceful, let him study the little chromo, "Why Don't He Come?" Neither art or nature can surpass the airy grace, with which that little pink-sik-lined umbrelia is poised above the brown-haired maiden, who is of Gallic extraction, complimented her way.
